A Ser moa on Paralture. The readers of novels and the students poetry will open their eyes very widely when the critic asserts—as I do, gravely and deliberately -that the two greatest master upholsterers of this age have been Walter Scott and Victor I am not speaking in any way figuratively. I mean that the writings of the two illustrious authors I have named—that their taste and their example—have brought about a radical change and revolution in the chairs on which we sit, the tables at which we cat, and modellers waited on their text, and in time ilbustrated it with graphic and plastic skill. The furniture, the tanestry, the mirrors and dressing glasses, the carved chests and jewelled oaskets of an epoch are a sure quide to its wants lat of July nort. and pastimes, its passious and its feelings; nor will the erceedingly composite natures of the mobilier of our own age be without meaning to the generations which are to come. When our "drift" shall be turned over by posterity. and our relies collected in musenms, when from from the astonishing wile-mile of Greek and Roman, of Gothic and Byzantine, of Saxon and Arabesque, of Italian and Scandinavian, antiquarles yet unborn shall strive to arrive at something like a conclusive opinion as to the civilization of the ninetcenth century, the verdict will, perhaps, amount to this: that we were not quite certain as to what was best, or what we really required, but that we experimented in all things, and were constant to none; that our civilization was of no particular or prevalent hue, but was multicoloured, like a harlequin's jacket: that we professed to believe in a great many things, but in reality believed in scarcely anything; that we were, in fine, not a settled generation, not an original generation, not generation given to doctrines of finality, but that we tried and tried, and gave everything a chance, and copied most things of antiquity that were good, and many that were bad, and continually expected something to "turn up but that, on the whole, although almost entirely destitute of definite ideas or thorough convic tions, we endeavoured to do the best we could, in the hope of hetter times and a new revelation.

For an answer let the questioner look back upon the "furniture" of English literature for a contury prior to the appearance of the Waverley Novels. The gorgeons picturesqueness of the Shakeperian, the Spenierian, and the Jonsonian poetry had disappeared. There is a passing glow of the superbly decorative in "Comus" and "The Allegro." There is a transient, meteor-like flush of picturesqueness in a few of Dryden's diamas. But what is the mise en scene of Wyoherly, and Congress, and Farquhar?
